Adverse possession is a method whereby a person who was not the owner of property obtains a valid title to that property by the passage of time.¹ The concept of adverse possession allows a person to claim title to property presently titled in another² and permits one to achieve ownership of another's property by operation of law.³ Adverse possession is thus recognized as a mode or method of acquiring title to property,⁴ but it is not a favored one.⁵

Cases:

An adverse possession claim is really one for recognition of title and enforcement of the rights that accompany title. Roy v. Woodstock Community Trust, Inc., 2013 VT 100A, 94 A.3d 530 (Vt. 2014).

"Adverse possession" has been defined as an actual and visible appropriation of property commenced and continued under a claim of right inconsistent with and hostile to the claim of another.¹ It also has been defined as the open and notorious possession and occupation of real property under an evident claim or color of right or, in other words, a possession in opposition to the true title and record owner—a possession commenced in wrong and maintained in right.²

Observation:

In some jurisdictions, the term used for adverse possession is "virgin title."³

§ 3. Governing law

Topic Summary | Correlation Table | References

West's Key Number Digest

West's Key Number Digest, Adverse Possession  2, 3

Adverse possession is an amalgam of statutory and common law¹ and is governed by both common and statutory law.² In some states, adverse possession may be established either under the common law or pursuant to statutory provisions.³ In other states, there is only one adverse-possession claim, which is the common law claim as amended by the legislature.⁴

Observation:

Statutes providing for the length of time during which an adverse possession must be maintained to ripen into title are not objectionable on the theory that they deprive the owner of property without due process of law.⁵

CUMULATIVE SUPPLEMENT

Cases:

Amendments to adverse possession statutes that added good-faith requirement applied to adverse possessor's claim to record owner's parking lot, which was adjacent to adverse possessor's property, where amendments expressly applied to claims that had not yet vested before enactment, and adverse possessor's claim had not yet vested before amendments were enacted, in that her period of possession of parking lot began about one year before enactment of amendments. Alaska St. §§ 09.10.030, 09.45.052\(a\). Prax v. Zalewski, 400 P.3d 116 (Alaska 2017).

Under statute governing adverse possession, the version of the law in effect at the time the purported adverse possession allegedly ripened into title is the law applicable to the claim, even if the action was commenced after the effective date of the new legislation. The rationale behind adverse possession lies in the sound public policy to encourage those who diligently develop and improve the land as against those who are content to hold the bare legal title inactively for many years. In an action based on adverse possession, the law as it exists at the time the adverse possession is perfected and title passes controls rather than the law as it exists at the beginning of the adverse occupation.¹ Even if the law permits the acquisition of title by adverse possession of certain property from the inception of the possession, title to the property cannot be so acquired if a statute is enacted before the expiration of the required period of adverse possession prohibiting adverse acquisition of title in that kind of property.² Further, where title has vested by adverse possession, it may not be disturbed retroactively by newly enacted or amended legislation,³ and thus, statutory changes to the law governing adverse possession do not apply to property owners whose rights to the disputed land had vested prior to that time.⁴

The law of the state in which real estate is located determines whether title has been acquired by adverse possession,⁵ and the acquisition of title to personalty by adverse possession is governed by the law of the state in which the property was situated at the time the transfer took place.⁶

Topic Summary | Correlation Table | References

West's Key Number Digest, Adverse Possession  1

Adverse possession has been held to be based on, or developed from, the statutes of limitation on actions for the recovery of property.¹ Indeed, an adverse possession statute serves as a statute of limitations, prohibiting any claim to the property unless possession adverse to the owner has continued for a period of time.² Adverse possession statutes, like other statutes of limitation, rest on a public policy that regards litigation with disfavor and aims at the repose of conditions that the parties have suffered to remain unquestioned long enough to indicate their acquiescence.³ The purpose of adverse possession statutes is to quiet title to property,⁴ and the intention of such statutes is not to punish one who neglects to assert rights but to protect those who have maintained the possession of property for the time specified by the statute under claim of right or color of title.⁵

Observation:

An adverse possession statute creates a period of limitations on an action to quiet title that runs only against the record owner of the land; the adverse possessor is under no duty to quiet title by judicial action nor to vigorously assert his or her right at every opportunity.⁶

§ 7. Presumption of grant or conveyance

Topic Summary | Correlation Table | References

West's Key Number Digest, Adverse Possession  1

Title by adverse possession has been held to rest on a presumed grant or conveyance¹ or on the presumption of a lost grant.² In other words, if it is shown that one has held an uninterrupted possession of property for a long period of time while exercising proprietary rights, the law raises a presumption of an ancient or lost grant of title.³

This presumption is one of policy,⁴ as well as convenience, and is necessary for the peace and security of society; it is founded on the consideration that the facts are such as could not, according to the ordinary course of human affairs, occur unless there was a transmutation of title to, or an admission of an existing title in, the party in possession.⁵ The presumption of a lost grant to property recognizes that lapse of time may cure the failure to secure the proper muniments of title even though the lost grant may not have been in fact executed.⁶

At the end of the appropriate statutory limitations period, the presumption that there was a grant crystallizes into a rule of law and becomes irrebuttable.⁷ Thus, if property is maintained in adverse possession for the statutory term, the law presumes a conveyance,⁸ and this includes a presumption of the occurrence of all matters essential to give the conveyance effect.⁹

§ 8. Distinguishing adverse possession and prescription

Topic Summary | Correlation Table | References

West's Key Number Digest, Adverse Possession  1

The term "adverse possession" should be distinguished from the term "prescription."¹ The terms differ principally in the nature of the right² or the kinds of land interests³ acquired, with adverse possession resulting in actual and complete legal title to the property,⁴ and prescription resulting in the acquisition of rights in the land of another, such as an easement.⁵ In adverse possession, the claimant occupies or possesses the land of the fee owner while in prescription, the claimant makes some easement-like use of it.⁶ In some jurisdictions, however, the acquisition of title to property by adverse possession is called prescription.⁷

To the extent that an analogy exists between adverse possession and prescription, the statutory rules for one should be applied to both.⁸ However, if the question involved is the kind of physical conduct requisite to gaining an easement by prescription, the conduct ordinarily required for acquiring the title to real property by adverse possession affords no analogy because one does not possess or occupy an easement or any other incorporeal right.⁹

While prescription is measured by use rather than by possession, the adverse use necessary to acquire a prescriptive right generally must commence in the same way and be of the same general character as the adverse possession required to give title to real estate.¹⁰ In either prescription or adverse possession, the right is acquired only by actual, continuous, uninterrupted use or possession by the claimant of the property of another, for a prescribed term.¹¹ In both situations, the use or possession must be inconsistent with the owner's use and enjoyment of the property and must not be a permissive use.¹²

In some states, the period of time within which the right to property by adverse possession and the right to an easement by prescription ripen is the same,¹³ but in other states, the period of time is different.¹⁴

Forms

Forms relating to elements of adverse possession, generally, see Am. Jur. Pleading and Practice Forms, Adverse Possession [\[Westlaw® Search Query\]](#)

In order for a party to establish title or ownership to property by adverse possession, the possession or use of such property must be hostile, actual, exclusive, continuous, and open and notorious throughout a prescribed period of time.¹ It is also generally necessary that the possession of the property be under a claim of right or title² or color of title.³ In some jurisdictions, the payment of taxes is also necessary.⁴ Some jurisdictions also require that the possession or use of the property be visible⁵ or that the possession be accompanied with an intent to hold against the true owner.⁶ When these elements coincide, title by adverse possession is acquired.⁷

If any one of the elements necessary to constitute adverse possession is absent, title by adverse possession cannot be gained.⁸ The existence of each element must be simultaneous and continuous for the required period.⁹

CUMULATIVE SUPPLEMENT

Cases:

To constitute an effective adverse possession, all of the elements for such a claim must be satisfied, and if any elements are not satisfied the possession will not confer title. Moody v. Sundley, 2015 ND 204, 868 N.W.2d 491 \(N.D. 2015\).

Purchasers of southern portion of tract of real property acquired title to northern portion by adverse possession under the ten-year adverse possession statute; purchasers entered into an earnest money contract and a purchase and sale agreement that included northern portion, though eventual deed did not, purchasers paid the taxes on the entire property, and purchasers visibly appropriated the northern portion in a manner plainly adverse to the title owners and that gave notice to any other person claiming a right in the property by mowing and clearing trees and seeking building permits. Landowner and his predecessors-in-interest exclusively possessed window wells that encroached on neighbor's property for statutory ten-year period, as needed for landowner to establish adverse possession of window wells; predecessors-in-interest believed window wells were part of their property and used them exclusively to benefit their property while they owned it, and landowner knew window wells existed when he purchased property and continued to use them exclusively to benefit his home even after he discovered in a survey three years later they were on neighbor's property. One claiming title by adverse possession always claims in derogation of the right of the true owner, admitting that the legal title is in another.¹ Thus, as a general rule, one who seeks to set up an adverse possession need not have a good title, or in fact any title, except a possession adverse and hostile to that of the true owner under a pretense or claim of title.² The adverse claimant rests the claim not on title but on holding adversely to the true owner for the term prescribed by the statute of limitations.³

Reminder:

Adverse possession also may exist with color of title, and under some statutes, color of title is essential to the acquisition of title by adverse possession.⁴

While a discussion of adverse possession ordinarily centers on real property, the same principle has been applied to the acquisition of title to personal property.¹ Thus, if a person has the peaceable, undisturbed, open possession of personal property, with an assertion of ownership, for the term that would bar an action for its recovery by the true owner, the claimant has acquired title superior to that of the true owner, whose neglect to assert legal rights results in a loss of title.²

For a person to acquire title to personal property by adverse possession, the possession must be under a claim of right and involve open, public, and notorious use³ and must be actual, hostile, continuous, and exclusive for the applicable limitation term.⁴

Some statutes provide that a person who possesses a movable thing in good faith and by a just title as owner during a certain period without interruption will thereby acquire the ownership of it unless the thing had been stolen or lost.⁵

Under the common law, the period for adverse possession of property was 20 years,¹ and some states still use this as the period of time of possession required to establish title by adverse possession.² The length of time during which adverse possession must be maintained, however, varies in the different jurisdictions.³ Further, in some states, the period of possession required to establish title by adverse possession varies according to specified circumstances and requirements.⁴

Whatever the period required in the particular jurisdiction and under the particular circumstances, title by adverse possession cannot be acquired unless it is shown that the adverse possession continued for that period.⁵

A period of constructive possession under one statute of limitations cannot be tacked to a period of actual possession under another statute of limitations to make out the required time of possession to establish title by adverse possession.⁶

The required period of possession, to prove ownership of property by adverse possession, begins when the rightful owner has been deprived of possession or displaced by someone exercising the powers and privileges of ownership.¹ The remedies of trespass or ejectment must be available to the owner of the property before adverse possession begins to run.²

If there is an adverse possession of land under a mistaken entry, the statutory period for acquiring title by adverse possession runs from the date of the entry and not from the discovery of the mistake.³ The statute of limitations for the recovery of real property begins to run when the cause of action accrues, and the cause of action accrues when the owner is deprived of possession; the fact that the owner is deprived of possession under a mistaken entry does not alter this rule.⁴

West's Key Number Digest, Adverse Possession  14

Actual possession is an indispensable element in adverse possession.¹ The actual possession of land necessary to constitute adverse possession requires a corporeal occupation,² and there must be an actual possession of at least some portions of the property to create a title by adverse possession.³ A mere intention on the part of a claimant to claim land adversely, unaccompanied by a physical entry or a taking of possession of the land, will never ripen into title.⁴ Likewise, a claim of ownership, in the absence of acts done upon the land indicating actual possession, gives no title by adverse possession to the claimant.⁵ One claiming property adversely therefore must be in actual possession of the property for the claim to be effective against the owner⁶ or before title will vest by adverse possession.⁷

Observation:

One purpose of the actual possession requirement is to give the true owner notice of the extent of the trespass because adverse possession generally does not extend beyond the land that the claimant actually occupies.⁸

CUMULATIVE SUPPLEMENT

Cases:

In order to establish adverse possession, a claimant must show they had actual possession of the subject property. Ruby River Canyon Ranch, Ltd. v. Flynn, 2015 WY 74, 350 P.3d 748 (Wyo. 2015).

"Actual possession," for purposes of adverse possession, has been defined as use and occupation of the property,¹ or dominion over the property,² or as possession in fact, effected by actual entry on, and actual occupancy of, the premises.³ Similarly, it has been defined as a possession evidenced by such use and occupation of the claimed property as to establish a clear dominion over it.⁴ "Actual possession" also has been defined as effective control over a definite area of land, evidenced by things visible to the eye or perceptible to the senses.⁵

There is no fixed rule by which the actual possession of real property by an adverse claimant may be determined in all cases⁶ because the determination of what constitutes possession of property for purposes of adverse possession depends on the facts in each case⁷ and to a large extent on the character or nature of the premises.⁸ There may be actual possession of real property without residence,⁹ cultivation of the lands,¹⁰ enclosure of the lands,¹¹ optimal use of the land,¹² erection of buildings on the land,¹³ or personal and physical,¹⁴ or actual, occupation of the property.¹⁵ A claimant's actual possession, however, requires something more than the mere occasional use of property.¹⁶ Thus, an occasional or periodical entry on property does not constitute actual possession.¹⁷

Actual possession, as required for adverse possession, requires a present ability to control the property possessed and an intent to exclude others from such control,¹ or a general holding and occupancy, with dominion over the property to the exclusion of others.² The evidence of a claimant's actual possession thus must be sufficient to alert a reasonably diligent owner to the adverse possessor's exercise of dominion and control.³ To establish adverse possession, however, the claimant need not stand guard at all times on the border of property to oppose the entry of trespassers or hostile claimants; it is enough if the person takes and maintains such possession and exercises such open dominion as ordinarily marks the conduct of owners in general in holding, managing, and caring for property of a similar nature and condition.⁴

The determination of what acts amount to actual possession of property, for purposes of adverse possession, depends upon and varies with the nature,¹ character,² and location of the property.³ In other words, the type of possessory acts necessary to constitute actual possession for purposes of adverse possession in one case may not be essential in another, due to the character and location of the property.⁴

What is actual possession for purposes of adverse possession may be one thing in a populous area, another thing in a sparsely settled area, and still a different thing in a city or village.⁵ Possession of an outlying and uncultivated piece of land therefore may be proved by acts of ownership somewhat different from those required with regard to land under enclosure and actual cultivation.⁶ Similarly, the acts of dominion necessary for adverse possession of a vacant lot need not be the same as with respect to a lot that is improved,⁷ and those acts that constitute possession of a residential lot may not constitute possession of a commercial lot.⁸ Furthermore, the acts sufficient to demonstrate possession of wild, undeveloped land may fall short of the activity needed to establish possession of developed property for purposes of adverse possession⁹ while the acts of possession required to establish adverse possession of woodland may be greater than in the case of swamp or marsh land.¹⁰

The determination of what acts amount to actual possession of property, for purposes of adverse possession, depends upon the uses to which the property can be applied¹ or for which it is adapted.² A claimant, to establish actual possession, must use the property for some purpose to which it is adapted,³ and it is sufficient that possession be shown by the continued use of the property for purposes for which it is susceptible.⁴ The standard to be applied to any particular tract of land is whether the possession comports with the ordinary management of similar lands by their owners, and if it does, satisfactory evidence of actual possession for adverse possession is furnished.⁵ An adverse possession claimant's use of the property thus need be only the ordinary use an owner would make of it to be actual use or possession for purposes of adverse possession.⁶

What one may do personally in the matter of taking and holding possession of real estate for adverse possession purposes may be done by or through another.¹ Thus, the requirement of actual possession of property necessary to acquire title by adverse possession need not be met by acts of the adverse claimant² but may be met through acts of another, who actually possesses and occupies the land for, and in subordination to, the adverse claimant.³ Accordingly, the requirement of actual possession may be met or kept fresh through possession on behalf of the adverse claimant by an agent,⁴ licensee,⁵ relative,⁶ or tenant.⁷ The fact that a permittee of an adverse claimant in possession of real estate pays no rent to the latter does not as a matter of law destroy the efficacy of such possession for the benefit of the claimant.⁸

The requirement of actual possession for purposes of adverse possession may be met or kept fresh through possession, on behalf of the adverse claimant, by a tenant of the claimant.¹ In other words, the possession by a tenant of the claimant is in law the possession of the claimant, who may claim the benefits.² The claimant, however, is bound by the nature of his or her lessee's possession.³

It has been held that the rule that adverse possession of a third person's land by a tenant inures to the benefit of the landlord generally does not apply if the land is not, either expressly or impliedly, within the terms of the lease.⁴ Thus, a landlord cannot base a claim of title by adverse possession to another's land on the possession of a tenant if the land was not included in the lease.⁵ It also has been held, however, that a tenant's adverse possession of a third person's land, not within the description in the lease, may inure to the landlord's benefit if the circumstances in connection with such possession justified the implication that it was included by virtue of the lease.⁶

To establish title by adverse possession, actual possession of a tract of land claimed adversely under color of title is generally just as necessary as actual possession without color of title.¹ Thus, an adverse possessor under color of title must show actual possession of the property in question.² If the adverse possession is under a color of title, however, it is ordinarily sufficient if only part of the premises described in the color of title are actually occupied since color of title serves to extend actual possession to constructive possession.³

A tax deed or title, even though invalid, generally constitutes color of title on which adverse possession under color of title may be based.¹ However, for a person to acquire title to land through adverse possession, even when relying on an invalid tax deed or title as color of title, that person must have made an actual entry on the land and taken actual possession of at least a part of it.²

Possession under an invalid tax deed need not be by the grantee personally to ripen into title by adverse possession but may be through an agent, licensee, or relative acting for the grantee.³

The constructive possession of real property is presumed to be in the holder of the record title¹ until there is an ouster and expulsion of the record owner by actual adverse possession² or actual hostile possession by another under a claim of title.³ A true owner who is in actual possession of a part of the land, claiming title to the whole, has the constructive possession of all of the land that is not in the actual possession of an intruder.⁴

Under the rule that the constructive possession of property is in the holder of the record title, a grantee of property is in constructive possession, although the grantor remains in actual possession, in the absence of evidence of any hostile claim by the grantor against the grantee.⁵

Constructive adverse possession of land ordinarily only occurs if actual possession of at least part of a tract has been taken under color of title.⁶ In the absence of adverse occupancy under color of title, there can be no constructive adverse possession of property on the part of an adverse claimant; under a claim of right, the law requires actual possession of all of the property claimed.⁷

Acts of ownership by the adverse claimant that are of such a nature as the claimant would exercise over his or her own property and would not exercise over that of another, and amount to such dominion over the property as to which it is reasonably adapted, ordinarily constitute acts of actual possession.¹ Specifically, actual possession, for the purposes of an adverse possession claim, may be indicated by the claimant's receipt of the rents, issues, and profits of the property;² conveyance of the property;³ grant of permission to others to use the property;⁴ leasing of the property;⁵ encumbrance of the property;⁶ quarrying of the property;⁷ building on the property;⁸ improvement of the property;⁹ or maintenance of the property.¹⁰ On the other hand, the uses of property for hunting,¹¹ fishing,¹² camping,¹³ and other recreational purposes¹⁴ ordinarily are not sufficient acts of dominion to constitute actual possession for adverse possession purposes. Likewise, the surveying and marking of a boundary is not an act sufficient to constitute possession.¹⁵

Maintaining a residence on property is an act of actual possession for purposes of establishing a claim of adverse possession.¹ Generally, however, actually residing on the property claimed is not necessary to constitute actual possession and to establish title by adverse possession² because a person may be in possession of real estate without residing on it.³ Statutory provisions, however, may have an effect on whether residence on the property is required.⁴

The cultivation of land is a sufficient act to constitute actual possession of the land for purposes of adverse possession.¹ The cultivation of land may take the form of growing crops,² or farming,³ or setting out an orchard and caring for the trees.⁴ There is authority that holds that regular mowing of a property constitutes cultivation for purposes of adverse possession⁵ although other authority holds that mowing is not a sufficient act to constitute actual possession.⁶ Sporadic cultivation does not constitute adverse possession.⁷

Although the cultivation of land is evidence of actual possession,¹ cultivation generally is not necessary to establish actual possession for purposes of adverse possession.² Some statutory provisions, however, may require the cultivation of real property as one of a limited number of acts to establish title by adverse possession.³

Practice Tip:

Under a statute recognizing adverse possession of land if it has been protected by a substantial enclosure or if it has been usually cultivated or improved, the adverse claimant need only prove possession by one of the means stated.⁴

Using land for the pasturing¹ or grazing² of animals may be sufficient to constitute the possession necessary for adverse possession.

Some authorities hold that if grazing or pasturing is relied on as evidence of actual use of land to support a claim of adverse possession, it must be accompanied by the enclosure³ or designed enclosure⁴ of the land. Such authorities thus hold that one does not have adverse possession of unenclosed land by using it for grazing or pasturing.⁵ Other authorities, however, do not require that the grazing or pasturing be accompanied by the enclosure of the land and hold that a claimant may be in adverse possession of unenclosed land by using it for grazing or pasturing.⁶

The adverse possession of lands by grazing is limited to those areas that are reasonably suited for grazing purposes.⁷

Practice Tip:

If the claimant has enclosed the land with a fence, it is not necessary to show that any animal actually grazed up to the fence line if the claimants and their predecessors claimed all the land within the fence and treated it as their property to use if they wished.⁸

It has been held that cutting timber may be sufficient to establish the dominion over property necessary to a claim of adverse possession,¹ but it has also been held that the cutting of timber² or trees³ is not sufficient evidence of actual possession.

If the land in question is woodland, there must ordinarily be such continuous and persistent cutting of timber or wood from the tract as to evidence a claim of ownership and be an advertisement to the world that the party is occupying the entire tract.⁴ Occasional or sporadic entries on land for the purpose of cutting timber are not sufficient to constitute actual possession to establish title by adverse possession.⁵

Tree farming, when carried out in a manner as to attract the attention of those entitled to notice, can be evidence of actual possession for purposes of adverse possession.⁶ Making turpentine, using maple groves, or gathering nuts or similar wild crops also may amount to actual possession of timber lands if the acts amount to more than a trespass.⁷

The enclosure of land, either of itself or in connection with other acts of dominion, may constitute the possession necessary for adverse possession.¹ A fence is an outstanding symbol of possession,² and the fencing in of property is very decisive in determining possession for purposes of proving adverse possession.³ Fencing an area of land is an act of ownership,⁴ and the actual possession of property necessary for a claim of adverse possession can be established by a designedly enclosed fence⁵ or a fence that defines the limits of the claim and warns the true owner of the necessity for him or her to take protective measures.⁶

Although the enclosure of land is evidence of possession,¹ the enclosure of property is not necessary to demonstrate possession for purposes of an adverse possession claim.² It is therefore not essential to the acquisition of title to land by adverse possession that it be enclosed³ or fenced.⁴ Some statutory provisions, however, may require enclosure as one of a limited number of acts, ordinarily written in the disjunctive, to establish title by adverse possession.⁵ Furthermore, in cases involving a claim of adverse possession to wild or woodlands, some authorities may require enclosure as one of a limited number of acts to establish title by adverse possession.⁶

If an enclosure of property is relied on as the act of possession in an adverse possession claim, the enclosure should be appropriate for the purposes to which the premises are adapted or for which the occupant may desire to use them.¹ An enclosure, for purposes of a possessory action for land determined by an enclosure, is not limited to fences and walls.²

The enclosure, like other acts of possession, must be sufficient to "fly the flag" over the land and put the true owner on notice that the property is held under an adverse claim of ownership.³ A fence, even if it is insufficient to turn livestock, may be sufficient to "fly the flag" and put the owner on notice of adverse possession.⁴ In fact, an enclosure having no purpose of physical exclusion may be sufficient to indicate the boundaries of an adverse claim even though it is only a mere furrow turned with a plow around the land or a line marked by cutting away the brush.⁵ Full⁶ or complete⁷ enclosure of the land is not required.

Observation:

Although enclosing land within a fence is sufficient to raise the flag of adverse possession, a fence kept simply for convenience has no effect upon the true boundary between tracts of land because, unlike a boundary fence, a fence of convenience gives rise to permissive use and permissive use will not support a claim for adverse possession.⁸

An enclosure, as an act of possession in an adverse possession claim, may be required by statute to be substantial.¹ To constitute a substantial enclosure within the meaning of an adverse possession statute, the enclosure must be of a substantial character in the sense of being appropriate and effective to reasonably fit the premises for some use to which they are adapted.² The enclosure need not be absolutely secure³ or need not actually prevent others from entering.⁴ The planting and maintaining a line of trees on the disputed property may constitute a substantial enclosure of the property.⁵

An enclosure, as an act of possession in an adverse possession claim, may be by natural or artificial marks that give notice of the character and extent of possession.¹ Thus, it is no objection that natural barriers are taken advantage of in constructing an enclosure around land that is adversely possessed.² An adverse claimant may enclose property with natural barriers in conjunction with artificial barriers³ or by natural barriers alone.⁴ Land forming a peninsula that is unfenced, because of its water boundary, therefore may be considered for all practical purposes as enclosed for adverse possession purposes.⁵

If a fence exists before the adverse claimant takes possession of the land and the claimant fails to demonstrate the purpose for which it was erected, then it is a casual fence rather than a fence that designedly encloses an area.¹ If the character of the use of the enclosed land by an adverse claimant is not such as to constitute, of itself, an actual and visible appropriation of the land, that use cannot be aided by a fence that casually creates the enclosure and to the construction of which neither the adverse claimant nor any person under whom the adverse claimant claims has contributed.² In other words, an adverse claimant can derive no aid in establishing the claim from an enclosure casually created by third persons in effecting a purpose of their own and who are strangers to both the claimant and the true owner of the enclosed land.³ A casual fence thus is insufficient to support the actual possession element of a claim for adverse possession.⁴

Repairing or maintaining a casual fence, even for the express purpose of keeping the adverse claimant's animals within the enclosed area, generally does not change a causal fence into a designed enclosure.⁵ A claimant, however, may substantially modify a casual fence and so change its character that the fenced-in area becomes a designed enclosure sufficient to satisfy the actual possession requirement for adverse possession.⁶

Observation:

The fact that an enclosure is formed by casual fencing does not, in and of itself, make the use and occupancy of the enclosure nonadverse.⁷

An adverse possession claim must be hostile at its inception.¹ Although there are instances wherein the occupancy of land without original intent to claim adversely subsequently became hostile in fact, these instances do not affect the principle that an adverse possession must be hostile from the beginning.² Such hostility must continue for the full statutory period,³ on the part either of the original adverse claimant or of those who claim to hold under such claimant.⁴

A statute specifying the length of time during which an adverse possession must be maintained to ripen into title begins to run at the time the possession of the claimant becomes hostile to that of the owner, which is generally the time of entry.⁵

Hostile possession, for purposes of an adverse possession claim, does not connote or require ill will,¹ malevolence,² animosity,³ or enmity⁴ but rather is an assertion of ownership adverse to that of the true owner.⁵ Hostility of possession means that one in possession of land claims the exclusive right to that land⁶ or occupies it as its owner.⁷ Such possession thus imports that the claimant is in possession as owner, in contradistinction to holding in recognition of or subordination to the true owner.⁸ Possession is hostile if the possessor holds and claims the property as his or her own, whether by mistake or willfully.⁹

To be hostile, the claimant's possession must be clear, distinct, and unequivocal.¹⁰ It must convey the clear message that the possessor intends to possess the land as his or her own.¹¹ Hostile possession must be such as to import a denial of the owner's title¹² or oust the owner from the land.¹³ A claimant's possession of land, to be hostile, thus must be incompatible with¹⁴ or in defiance of the rights of others.¹⁵

It is not necessary that the claimant expressly declare the possession to be hostile¹⁶ or make a showing of force or actual dispute for his or her possession of the property to be hostile.¹⁷ It also is not necessary that the claimant's use of the premises be such as to indicate at all times a hostile occupancy.¹⁸ Further, it is not essential that the use of the adverse claimant be challenged by, and the use continued over the objection of, the true owner.¹⁹ The mere use²⁰ or possession of land, however, does not in and of itself show hostility to the owner.²¹

The determination of whether the character of a possession is hostile, in an adverse possession claim, is determined by the occupant's own views, actions, and intentions and not those of his or her adversary.²²

Practice Tip:

A parol gift of land, when proven by clear and convincing evidence, establishes a presumption that the donee's claim to the property is hostile to the donor.²³

CUMULATIVE SUPPLEMENT

Cases:

"Under a claim of right," as an element of an adverse possession claim, means that the claimant is in possession as owner, with intent to claim the land as its own, and not in recognition of or subordination to the record title owner. Harvey v. Furrow, 2014 ME 149, 107 A.3d 604 \(Me. 2014\).

In order to establish adverse possession, the use of the property must be "hostile," that is without permission and in a manner that is inconsistent with the rights of the true owner. Waisanen v. Superior Tp., 305 Mich. App. 719, 854 N.W.2d 213 \(2014\).

In determining what amounts to hostility, for purposes of adverse possession, the relation that the adverse possessor occupies with reference to the owner is important¹ and thus may be considered.² The nature of the occupation of property may be sufficient to give notice of its adverse character to interested parties who are strangers and yet not be sufficient as to persons standing in a more intimate relationship.³ For example, the occupation of a family estate by one of the family is so usual that the acts of occupation that would show hostile possession as to strangers are not sufficient to show an adverse holding as to relatives.⁴

If the parties are related, there may be a presumption that the use of the property is permissive rather than hostile.⁵ Further, where there is a close and cooperative relationship between the record owner and the person claiming title through adverse possession, a presumption of hostility may not apply.⁶ A claimant's possession of property, however, may be hostile, even though the claimant is a relative of the true owner, such as where the true owner told the claimant he or she needed to move from the property, but the claimant stated he or she was going to stay.⁷

In some jurisdictions, for possession to be hostile for the purposes of adverse possession, the claimant must intend to claim title to,¹ or assert dominion over, the property at issue.² For possession to be hostile in such jurisdictions, a claimant must demonstrate a subjective intent to possess the property intending to be its owner and not in subordination to the true owner,³ or must occupy the disputed land with the intent to possess it as his or her own,⁴ or must demonstrate an intention to claim exclusive ownership of the property occupied.⁵ The claimant's intent to possess the disputed land, rather than the intent to take from the true owner, governs whether possession is hostile.⁶ In other words, hostile use or possession does not require an intention to dispossess the rightful owner, or even knowledge that there is one, but rather, there must be an intention to claim the property as one's own to the exclusion of all others.⁷ In such jurisdictions, no matter how hostile to the true owner the possession may be in appearance, it cannot be adverse unless it is accompanied by the intent on the part of the occupant to make it so.⁸

In other jurisdictions, the claimant's subjective intent is irrelevant to hostile possession if his or her acts import a hostile or adverse character to his or her use of the land.⁹

In jurisdictions in which intent is required for possession to be hostile for purposes of adverse possession, the intent with which the claimant has held possession ordinarily is determined by what the claimant has done in respect to the property.¹ The intent with which a claimant has held possession thus may be determined from all the surrounding circumstances, especially the claimant's acts.² Specifically, such intent may be inferred from the claimant's acts of dominion over the land.³

Forms relating to owner consent and prevention of acquisition, generally, see Am. Jur. Legal Forms 2d, Adverse Possession; Am. Jur. Pleading and Practice Forms, Adverse Possession [\[Westlaw® Search Query\]](#)

In order for possession to be hostile, for purposes of adverse possession, the use or possession of the property by the claimant must be without permission asked of, or given by, the true owner.¹ Permissive possession is not hostile or adverse and will not support an adverse possession claim² since permissive possession is not considered to be the possession of the occupant but rather the possession of the party on whose pleasure the permissive possession depends.³ Indeed, "hostile possession" generally means that the possessor does not have the true owner's permission to be on the land⁴ and has been defined simply as possession without the permission of the true owner.⁵ Hostile possession, as an element of adverse possession, thus is negated by a claimant seeking permission for use of the property from the record owner⁶ or by the true owner's permission to the claimant to be on the land.⁷ Such permission may be either express or implied.⁸

If a right to the use or possession of property is conferred by grant, any use or possession that is reasonably consistent with that grant will be considered permissive and not hostile or adverse.⁹ Thus, possession under a license¹⁰ or an agreement granting the right of occupancy is not hostile or adverse.¹¹ A possessor who holds the property as a tenant therefore does not possess the property hostilely.¹² Even possession under a void license or grant is a permissive use,¹³ and one who enters on land by the owner's permission under a promise or expectation that the occupant will be given the land does not have a hostile holding or possession that will ripen into title.¹⁴ However, a donee who accepts a gift of land asserts a property right that is independent of the record owner's, so his or her use is not permissive.¹⁵

With respect to permissive use, entering real property as part of a lease agreement is entering it with permission and with acknowledgment of the owner's superior title and is not entering the land with hostile or adverse intent. The possession or use of property by permission will not ripen into title by adverse possession¹ no matter how long it is maintained or continued.² Time alone will not suffice to transform permissive use into legal title.³ Thus, if a party's initial usage of land is found to have been permissive, the continued usage of another party's land will not ripen into adverse possession by the mere passage of time.⁴

The possession or use of another's property is generally presumed to be permissive,¹ and is not presumed to be hostile, for purposes of an adverse possession claim.² In some jurisdictions, a familial relationship between the claimant and the true owner of the property creates a presumption of permissive possession or use,³ and some authority holds that the presumption of permissive possession or use is stronger when the parties are related.⁴ In other jurisdictions, however, no presumption exists that a close family membership between claimants to property renders the prior use of that property permissive.⁵

Trial Strategy

Permissive Possession or Use of Land, As Defeating Claim of Adverse Possession or Prescriptive Easement, 68 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 3d 239

Possession that is permissive in its inception may become hostile for purposes of adverse possession¹ but only when the permission has been withdrawn or when events have occurred indicating that the original permission is no longer obtained.² If the original entry is not hostile, the possession does not become hostile until the adverse claimant disavows the idea of holding for, or in subserviency to, the true owner and actually sets up an exclusive right in the adverse claimant.³ In other words, if the original entry on land is by permission of the owner or under some right or authority derived from the owner, the possession does not become hostile, and adverse possession does not commence, until the permission or authority has been repudiated⁴ and renounced, and the claimant thereafter has assumed the attitude of hostility to any right in the real owner.⁵

To change the character of the possession from permissive to hostile, the disavowal of the record owner's title and the assertion of an adverse claim must be shown by some clear, positive, and unequivocal act brought home to the owner,⁶ such as by an explicit disclaimer.⁷ There must be either actual notice of the hostile claim, or acts or declarations of hostility so manifest and notorious, or so open and notorious, that actual notice will be presumed, in order to change permissive possession to hostile or adverse possession.⁸

Observation:

In some jurisdictions, where a special relationship exists, the putative adverse possessor must give actual notice to the true owner of the change in status from permissive to adverse.⁹

CUMULATIVE SUPPLEMENT

Cases:

For a permissive use to become adverse possession there must be proof that the permissive user utilized the property in a manner inconsistent with the dedicated/permissive use, or, alternatively, that the permissive user notified the dedicator in a clear, positive and distinct way that it claimed title or ownership other than by dedication or permission. In determining whether a permissive use has been changed into a hostile use for purposes of adverse possession, the evidence must be strictly construed against the adverse user,¹ and the burden is on the claimant to prove that he or she changed the character of the possession.²

For the purpose of changing permissive possession to hostile possession, mere possession or ordinary acts of ownership that are consistent with the permission are not enough to provide notice of the hostile claim.³ The evidence of adverse holding when the original entry is by permission must be very clear.⁴

The continued possession of land after a judgment divesting the one in possession of title and vesting it in another is permissive, and not adverse for purposes of adverse possession, until notice of a hostile claim is brought home to the prevailing party.¹

Hostile possession, as an element of adverse possession, may exist if possession was taken by mistake¹ or occurred inadvertently.² Hostile possession will be satisfied even if the claimant mistakenly believes that he or she owns the property and occupies it.³ The mistaken belief must be a pure mistake, however, and not one based upon conscious doubt about the true boundary.⁴ Possession thus is considered hostile when the claimant claims ownership of the land of another although the claimant is under a mistaken belief that the land lies within the description contained in his or her own deed.⁵

Possession is not the less hostile because the claimant takes possession of the land innocently and through mistake or ignorance as to ownership or as to boundary lines since it is possession with the intention to possess the land occupied under a belief that it is the possessor's own that constitutes its hostile character.⁶ Mistake thus cannot be pleaded in avoidance of the legal effect of the possession.⁷

Forms relating to boundary line, generally, see Am. Jur. Pleading and Practice Forms, Adverse Possession [Westlaw® Search Query]

If a landowner, in ignorance of actual boundaries, takes and holds possession by mistake up to a certain line beyond the boundary limits, on the claim and in the belief that it is the true line, with the intention to claim title, and if necessary to acquire title by possession up to that line, that possession is hostile, for acquisition of title by adverse possession.¹ Even if the claimant, on occupancy under a mistake as to the true boundary, did not intend to take land from the true owner and did not intend to occupy and possess land to which the claimant had no record title, the possession may be hostile if the claimant intended to occupy and did occupy the land as the owner.²

On the other hand, it has been held that, if a party, through ignorance, inadvertence, or mistake, occupies up to a given line beyond that party's actual boundary, believing it to be the true line, but not having an intention to claim title to that extent if it should be ascertained that the line is on a neighbor's land, the possession is not hostile for purposes of adverse possession.³ In other words, if the possession is up to a fixed boundary under a mistake as to the true line and the intention is to hold only to the true line, the possession is not hostile and will not ripen into title.⁴ Thus, where land is occupied through mistake as to the property line with the intention to claim only to the true line, wherever it may be, a claim for adverse possession of the mistakenly occupied land will be denied.⁵

Observation:

In some jurisdictions, an adverse possession claim does not include an intent requirement, and therefore, a claimant's intention to hold only to the true boundary wherever that boundary might be does not defeat a claim of one seeking title by adverse possession to land beyond the true boundary.⁶

CUMULATIVE SUPPLEMENT

Cases:

A long-existing fence may serve as a well-defined boundary even if the property owner is mistaken as to the location of the true line and does not intend to claim property beyond the true boundary. Elsea v. Day, 448 S.W.3d 259 (Ky. Ct. App. 2014), review denied, (Dec. 10, 2014).

Adverse possession involving ignorance or mistake as to boundaries—modern views, 80 A.L.R.2d 1171

If an intention is manifested to claim title to a visible, fixed, and ascertained boundary line in all events, the possession is hostile for purposes of adverse possession, even if it is erroneously assumed to be the true line and the possession is held and the claim made because of the mistake as to the location of the boundary.¹ In other words, if the claim is to a visible boundary in all events, whether it is the true line or not, the possession is hostile.² Thus, if an occupant claims land up to an established and visible line, such as a fence, and although the line as marked by the fence is erroneous in fact as a boundary line, the possession up to the fence is hostile if the occupant believes it to be the true boundary line and intends to hold and claim the land to it.³ If the possession of real property, even though maintained up to certain fixed and visible lines, is without any intention to claim title to the land, however, it will not be considered hostile for the purposes of an adverse possession claim.⁴

If adjoining landowners agree on a boundary line and each occupies up to its location, the possession is presumed to be hostile, for purposes of adverse possession, on the part of the occupant who lacks title, and the boundary is fixed after the prescribed statutory period.¹ Thus, when a border, even though erroneous, is observed by all parties as the boundary of the property for the required statutory period, it becomes the true boundary through adverse possession.²

Fence as factor in fixing location of boundary line—modern cases, 7 A.L.R.4th 53

If a fence is constructed as a boundary line fence between two properties, and if the parties concerned claim ownership of the land to the fence during the prescribed statutory period without interruption in their possession or control during that time, they will acquire title by adverse possession to any land that was improperly enclosed with or added to the land they owned at the time the fence was constructed.¹ Long recognition and acquiescence by adjoining landowners in a boundary fence raises a presumption that the land was held hostilely or adversely up to the fence.² The placement of a fence within one's boundary line, however, does not lead to the relinquishment of the lands outside the fence, without an additional showing that those lands outside the fence have been used by the neighboring landowner under a claim of ownership for the requisite period of time.³

Observation:

Where a fence is used as a boundary between properties, it is immaterial who constructed it.⁴

Cases:

Property owners acquired land between fence and southern boundary of Indian tribe's land by adverse possession before tribe purchased the land which was adjacent to owners' property, where disputed property had been in owners' family for decades, permanent, visible fence marked the boundary between the two properties for decades, both owners and prior owners of adjacent land treated fence as the property line, and owners had gone onto disputed property, cut trees, trimmed branches, and mended the fence for 70 years. One who remains in possession of a building or other structure of a permanent nature that encroaches beyond the boundary line, during the prescribed statutory period in which actions to recover possession of real property may be maintained, acquires title by adverse possession to that portion of the adjoining property covered by the structure, even if it was erected in ignorance of the location of the true boundary line, and supposedly on land rightfully owned by the builder.¹ To acquire title by adverse possession by this means to a strip of adjoining property, the building or other structure must be of a substantial and permanent nature, sufficient to call the attention of the owner of record to the encroachment.² Although one may acquire title to that portion of an adjoining lot on which a building is erected and maintained for the statutory period, title is not obtained to that portion of a lot that would have been covered had the building been extended the full length of the lot.³

The claimant must occupy with the intent to claim title to all land covered by the encroachment to acquire title by adverse possession.⁴ If the improvements are located beyond what is supposed to be the true line, and the party making them intends to claim only to the true line, to be thereafter ascertained, whenever and wherever it might be located, the possession is not hostile or adverse.⁵

Some authorities hold that title to land by adverse possession may be based on the fact that the wall of a building belonging to the one claiming by adverse possession leans over the land claimed by adverse possession.¹ Other authorities, however, hold that the mere tipping of a wall of a building so as to project into the airspace above the adjoining lot does not interrupt the continuity of possession of the owner of the lot so as to bring it within the provisions of the statute of limitations applicable to cases of persons not in possession.²
